

SCANNING KEY CONTENT OF TEXT BASED MATERIAL at Point of Accessioning or Cataloging

A project of the Harvard Library Lab, made possible through the generous support of the Arcadia Fund

Amy Benson, Schlesinger Library
Nell Carlson, Divinity School Library
Debbie Funkhouser, Schlesinger Library
Karen Nipps, Houghton Library

Project origins

A decorative gold frame with intricate scrollwork and floral patterns. Inside the frame, the text "A Picture is Worth 1,000 Words" is written in a blue, typewriter-style font, centered on a white background.

The Whys

- Quick and cost effective complement to centralized imaging services
- Visual inspection by remote users
- Efficiencies for both catalogers and users
- Searchability with OCR
- Automating cataloging

“Nothing comes easy.”—Nell’s dad.

Ambitious vision

Baby steps

Here is what we needed

- √ Scanners in our cataloging units
- √ Permission and training to contribute images to the digital repository
- √ Technical infrastructure
 - Crash course in image file formats and standards (JPG? JP2000? TIF?)
 - Formatted links for the holdings records
 - Programming to enable display of thumbnails in our discovery platform

Fair Use guidelines It's complicated!

Technical infrastructure

- File format: JP2 for image size flexibility – thumbnails to full size images
- File naming: systemno_sequenceno_partcode to support automatic creation of 856 fields in 'book' order (cover, tp, toc, etc.)

Technical infrastructure

- Upon image deposit, each repository receives a report that includes file name and URN for digitized object
- Macros
 - Excel: Using the deposit report, split the file name into component parts, expand partcode for $3, combine elements for complete 856
 - MacroExpress: take the system no. and completed 856 from spreadsheet , pull up holdings record, copy and paste complete 856 into local cataloging system

In milling GOLD MEDAL FLOUR the great aim of the Washburn-Crosby Co. is to help the housewife and the baker make better bread, rolls, biscuits and pastry at less cost; furthermore extraordinary pains are taken that the baking may be made easy.

Over a million American housewives and bakers can testify to perfect satisfaction in using Washburn-Crosby's GOLD MEDAL FLOUR. Therefore, do not be troubled about your bread, rolls or pastry but buy GOLD MEDAL FLOUR and find that with it there are no baking troubles.

The Daily Capacity of the Washburn-Crosby Mills is 50,000 barrels and the facilities in every department offer opportunities to serve you not equaled by other milling concerns.
